I have tried making a matrix of type float[][] like this: float[][] gradient = new float[360][2]; Then I loop through each row (rotating 90 degree), then inside of this loop I update the color value using: gradient[r][1] = (byte) (1.0f * (gradient[r-1][0] + gradient[r-1][1] + gradient[r-1][2])); It only seems to be working if I reduce the range of the color inside the loop. A: The problem was that I was assigning to the same array twice. This would overwrite the old value when looping through the rows. I changed it to something like this: float[][] gradient = new float[360][2]; for (int r = 0; r One of the most conspicuous thing about the recent Liberal leadership campaign was the lack of hard policy by its candidates. They mostly stuck to what Justin Trudeau called “shallow slogans,” something that is in short supply among the party’s candidates. Trudeau himself, who is now the front runner, doesn’t appear to have any
