Those young scientists at the tip of their fingers with their DNA sequencers and their vast knowledge of genetics may well find themselves wondering whether it's really worth it to get to know someone. I recently had a conversation with a friend who has spent months and months studying people for signs of a gene that might make them more or less likely to fall in love. I said to him, "If it's not worth knowing your loved one, don't you think you're probably risking developing something like BPD [Borderline Personality Disorder]?" "But," he replied, "there's a large amount of heritability to personality disorders, so I'm still doing my best to be an informed observer, because if I choose to engage with someone, I still want them to be someone that I'm interested in."

As a psychologist, I think it's important that we don't romanticise love, and we don't romanticise relationships. Even relationships with people who are unhealthy are often a place of great tenderness, and vice versa. The question of how to develop good relationships, and whether it is possible to be in a stable relationship or not, is a complicated one. On the one hand, relationships are stressful, and most of us would love to find someone who is loving and supportive. On the other hand, it's been found that there are many "love ins" and not nearly as many "love outs". We can't all be perfect. When people talk about being "ready" for a relationship, it can often sound like the end is near. It can be difficult to know when people are ready, and when they're not, but it's better to be safe than sorry. If you're not confident in
