Japanese company Aplaya has teamed up with Aarii to release a set of 8 packs based on the Street Fighter franchise. It's interesting to think that while this set of packs will likely be the most expensive line of Nintendo-licensed goods to date, that is not the item we find the most shocking. The outfits are all pretty... 'bad'. There are usually two kinds of console gaming-related photos that are shared online: images of a game's characters or images of the game's cabinets. In this case, the collector and shop owner, Ken Katoh, took a different approach when he released these on a website along with his musings about their creation. They are interesting not only for the costumes they're based on, but for the reasons behind their creation. The outfits are actually from Street Fighter II Turbo, the sequel to Street Fighter II in which the characters move to a faster rhythm than their more laid-back forebears. Street Fighter II Turbo is not only is the best-known entry in the Street Fighter II series, but it is also one of the most comprehensive revisions of the Street Fighter II formula. This is the expansion pack to the most widely-purchased Turbo CD. For those unfamiliar with games, at the time, Sega CD was a high-capacity, 32-bit CD-ROM add-on to your Sega Genesis or Sega Mega Drive console. Like other CD-ROM add-ons, it needed a special CD-ROM drive, which was typically obtained through an add-on like the Sega CD-ROM Super System (which brought Super Hang-On and Sonic the Hedgehog 2 to Sega CD owners in 1989) or through the Sega CD Eye Toy (which came with an infrared set of glasses that triggered the Genesis to play music and display various games in a similar manner to the NES' IR sensors). The Sega CD drives changed as time progressed, but there is one signature sound of the machines' CD drives that has held true: their distinctive, wavier notes. Fans of video game music have had a love-hate relationship with Sega CD soundtracks. ba244e880a
