I'm not a musician, and a lot of the tutorials/blogs online are geared towards players and pros. I've looked around and am wondering if there are some really good professionals out there with some tips for amateurs? My aim is to be able to record/ produce quality songs, but I don't want to spend $1000s of pounds unless it's worth it. I have a mid-range laptop with a pretty good mic that I can record/monitor myself. A: Not all studio software is equal, although XCEL and Logic are both, in my opinion, reasonably good and the question you need to ask yourself is, which will suit you better: Do you want to work without a click mix, or Do you want to mix yourself? So if your work will be mixed, I'd strongly recommend you buy a real multitrack (hardware) DAW. I think that these days there aren't many DAWs that have yet become commonplace, so it's not like you can go to your nearest computer store and pick one up. But if you go to a store that deals specifically in software (such as Emu) then you'll get the best recommendation, and you can even take it home and test it before buying (I would). The software prices vary wildly, but you can get an entry-level multitrack system for £1000-£1200, and a dedicated mixing system for around £3000-£4000. One interesting thing about these (if your work won't be mixed) is that they have similar price-bands. If you're only producing and recording vocals, you can get a cheaper (but less powerful) system for under £500, but if you'll be mixing vocals and instruments, you'll have to pay a lot more. I've had personal experience using DAWs, and I can certainly say, having used the best and the worst, that the best have some excellent advantages and disadvantages, and the worst have some similar problems. Without wanting to bore you with an in-depth description of all the advantages/disadvantages, I'll just say that some of the advantages I found in certain DAWs included: More comprehensive workflow, with 3e33713323
