Age-related differences in thiamine-induced localization of ³⁵S-methionine in the rat brain. Rats of different ages (young, middle-aged and old) were injected with a small (100 mg/kg) or large (800 mg/kg) dose of [³⁵S]methionine and were killed 1 h later. In both dosage groups, old animals showed a lower degree of labeling in brain tissue than did young animals, whereas middle-aged animals did not show the age-related reduction. [³⁵S]Thiamine autoradiograms also showed fewer silver grains in the brain of middle-aged rats and even fewer in old animals. It is concluded that the age-related effect in the rat brain can be attributed to a reduction in methionine uptake. Pages Thursday, February 9, 2009 In memoriam: Sean Dunne I'm very sad to announce the passing of comic book artist Sean Dunne. I'd known Sean for a while, but I really got to know him last year through another comic artist, Fiona Staples, who was drawing three issues of a series called Chew. This became our project together, which we named "Chew and Cheese," from which a novella will be released. Fiona has been opening up the world of comic books to me, so I'm very grateful. After our project ended, Sean and I teamed up with writer Jamie Rich for a two issue mini-series called "The Primitives," which was about ancient humans surviving in a world that was not their own, a survival of humanity but without the guile or the complications we expect from humans. Sean and Jamie were a great team, and the book was hilarious. I've never met an artist like Sean before--he was full of ideas and never satisfied with the end product. He had a knack for mixing realistic visuals with the absurd, but it was always his sense of humor that made the book soar off the page. I think he might have turned some of my readers off, but that's okay. The world is a better place for Sean's presence. Voter ID laws are the focus of fierce political debate in states across the U.S. But are they actually effective in ensuring that only qualified voters are participating in elections? Not really. The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) released a report Thursday, which outlines the problems with voter fraud, and proposes solutions.

What's New In?

J.J. Abrams' Bad Robot found a new home, and it's going to be very easy on your wallet. Variety reports that Deadline has confirmed that Paramount will distribute all of Abrams' films going forward. That means that Bad Robot's new Warner Bros. owned streaming service — rumored to be a TV/movie streaming service similar to Netflix or Disney — will distribute all of Abrams' theatrical pics. Why the switch? Variety doesn't say, but it's clear that Abrams' high-profile projects are an embarrassment of riches for streaming services, and the deal makes sense. If you're launching a streaming service and you don't have a slew of recognizable movies to play to your base, why bother? But the biggest name on the deal, Abrams, will obviously have to do something with the deal. Bad Robot has just a few pictures left on its slate — Star Wars: The Rise of Skywalker is in theaters this week, followed by The Entire History of 2020. Could the streaming deal have something to do with Bad Robot president Melissa Black leaving Paramount Pictures to take a VP position at Bad Robot? Maybe Bad Robot's new streaming home will allow them to distribute all of Abrams' movies. And since Abrams is looking to make a full-on streaming service (as we've heard for months), Bad Robot may have decided to make the move before it is too late. Still, the new deal's biggest snag is Abrams himself. A lot of his movies have better box office runs than Bad Robot's movies currently do. As Deadline notes, that's because those movies are more expensive to make, which means there's more money to be made. Still, the studio isn't currently planning to make a new Star Wars film, but they'd probably be open to that after Abrams, who has been a mainstay of the franchise since 2005's Episode III, departs. Effect of a vancomycin column in a peripheral venous catheter on colonization of central venous catheter and infection in patients admitted to a medical intensive care unit. The objective was to determine whether the insertion and use of vancomycin eluting (VEC) peripheral venous catheters (PVCs) decrease colonization of central venous catheters (CVCs) and infections in CVC-dependent critically ill patients.
