Every parenting book seems to be selling one of two things: one of those strategies that means you spend half the time being pissed off at your child, or one that presents you with a glorious opportunity to stay in touch with your child’s spirit. With that in mind, here’s what I think non-intrusive parents need to understand about parenting, and what we do as parents: First, parenting is not about rules and punishments. It’s about relationship building. It’s about demonstrating respect for your child and showing them that you care. In many ways, the rules we follow and the punishments we impose are symbolic of our commitment to the relationship. This means we don’t have to be on top of our children constantly. We can sometimes rely on their own goodness to remind them what respect looks like. But we must never let the relationship with our children become an issue of rules and rules only. We have to be willing to set aside our own pleasure in order to make sure our kids’ behavior and their own safety are uppermost in our minds. And most of all, our kids have to know that we’re not there to control their behavior, and that we’re not there to punish them when they do something wrong. Second, parenting is not an exchange. I wish it were. But it’s not. I wish I could love my kids more than I do, and I wish they would love me the way I love them. But I can’t. And they don’t. So if it’s true that parenting is an exchange, then the parents who do it badly are the ones who aren’t willing to go deep enough to give themselves. The ones who do it really 54b84cb42d
