"Zombie food" Will Open Friday at the MFA The horror genre runs deep within artists; with the recent release of George Romero's remake of "Dawn of the Dead" and The Nightside's review of "The Walking Dead", the thought of a day when zombie-based movies and shows come not from George Romero or Stephen King, but through my girlfriend, is simply not appropriate. In the same vein as the fictional world of "Game of Thrones", the MFA's "zombie food" installation creates a scene in which they are trying to stop the spread of zombie life and show you what a real life "walk-like-a-zombie" looks like. About 100 zombies attend this "zombie" feast. They all sit down together at a long table, their shirts and shirtsleeves and pants hanging off of them. "This is important to our show," stated Stephanie Butler, part of the creative team behind the show. "People don't eat what the zombies eat... We're trying to create that interaction so that you feel like you're there." My first impression was that this was going to be the logical extension of the end of the world. It seemed every day that the world would cease to exist. Day after day, zombies drop dead. After the huge zombie feast, the food begins to break down; the zombies are no longer zombies, and they start to deviate into different patterns of behavior. There are about 35 different dishes of food, from tacos to a vegetarian-based dish that I had not expected. But it was the food that drew me in. It was probably the lack of smiling, dead zombies staring into the viewer that made me feel uncomfortable, but I could not stop looking at the food. "This is important
