Counteraction of morphine with remifentanil for total intravenous anesthesia of dogs. The aim of this study was to assess the efficacy of remifentanil for total intravenous anesthesia (TIVA) in dogs, and the antidotal effect of naloxone on remifentanil for TIVA. Twenty-four adult beagle dogs were randomly divided into four groups. Group I received morphine (4 mg/kg) and saline, group II received morphine (4 mg/kg) and remifentanil (1.5 microg/kg), group III received remifentanil (1.5 microg/kg) and saline, and group IV received remifentanil (1.5 microg/kg) and naloxone (3 microg/kg). Anesthesia was induced with propofol, maintained with isoflurane or sevoflurane in oxygen, and antagonized with naloxone in a randomized order. Respiratory rate (RR), arterial blood pressure (ABP), heart rate (HR) and end-tidal CO₂ (ETCO₂) were recorded at 1, 3, 5, 7, 10 and 20 min after the injection of morphine, and at 1 and 5 min after naloxone. Mean arterial blood pressure (MAP), HR and RR decreased significantly at 1 and 5 min after the injection of morphine. MAP, HR and RR decreased to the baseline at 5 min after remifentanil was given. The incidence of RR or =4 mm Hg was significantly higher in group I than in other groups at 5 min after morphine injection. The incidence of ETCO₂ > or =4 mm Hg was significantly higher in group II than in group I. The incidence of ETCO₂ > or =4 mm Hg in groups III and IV were significantly lower than in group II. The RR > or =10 breaths/min was significantly higher in group II than in group I at 5 min after morphine injection. The incidence of RR > or =10 d0c515b9f4 human endothelial cells from death caused by thrombin and staurosporine. In spite of the importance of endothelium as a key regulator of vascular homeostasis, little is known about the mechanisms through which it is regulated. To begin to address this issue, we examined the effects of Ginkgo biloba (ginkgo) on the viability of bovine aortic endothelial (BAE) cells. Ginkgo extracts were prepared from both whole leaves and from fractions of the stem. Among the extracts, the ethanol and butanol fractions from the stem showed significantly more potent growth-promoting effects than the hexane fractions. Furthermore, the methanol extract from the whole leaf was found to show the most potent cell growth-stimulating effect. This extract was fractionated by gel filtration, and the active substance(s) in the fraction showing the most potent cell growth-stimulating effect was isolated and shown to be mainly a mixture of flavonoids.

In order to examine whether these flavonoids had any effects on endothelial cells, the viability of BAE cells was assayed in the presence of various flavonoid extracts. Our results indicated that the cells were protected against thrombin-induced death in a concentration-dependent manner, but were unaffected by addition of staurosporine, a protein kinase inhibitor. These results suggest that ginkgo extracts may exert some of their beneficial effects through protection against thrombin-induced endothelial cell death.
