A modern wind turbine typically includes a tower, a generator, a gearbox, a nacelle, and a rotor. The rotor typically includes a rotatable hub having one or more rotor blades attached thereto. A pitch bearing is typically configured so as to rotate with the hub and a pitch bearing housing is typically configured to rotate with the hub, the rotor, and the tower. A pitch bearing may be supported by a bearing liner in a bore in the bearing housing. An inner race of the pitch bearing is typically supported by the bearing liner with a radial bearing. In the latter, the gearbox includes a turbine that drives a generator through a shaft, commonly called the "tail shaft." The rotor blades may be cast or forged and include a root, a platform, and an airfoil that includes a leading edge and a trailing edge. The leading edge is configured to interact with a flow of air entering the wind turbine, thereby causing the airfoil to move in a generally upstream direction. Movement of the airfoil generates a lift force that extracts energy from the flow and thereby drives the wind turbine. Conversely, movement of the airfoil generates a drag force as the airfoil moves through the flow. Depending on the design, all of, or an increasing amount of, the drag force may be converted to an electric power that may be utilized by a ground-based electric grid. The design of a wind
