Zverev's early wickets came and went with little concern from his partner, but Wimbledon still went on to make an unlikely win. Hasek showed another side of his talent by notching up a point or two during the course of the game, while Hou Yifan halted another second-round collapse with a brace of service breaks. Zverev has a future at the top of the game if he continues to play the way he has so far this week. He showed that he has already made strides forward since last year's US Open when he hammered the ball on a platter to clinch his match against Kei Nishikori. He took an unfortunate loss to Andreas Seppi at Wimbledon but has since made amends with a practice of those strokes in recent practice. Zverev is still maturing, but he had the opportunity to shine in a first-round Grand Slam for the first time. This was a missed chance, one that should be punished. The Briton and his fellow-Big Four contingent will have one more chance to shine at the US Open. Given the number of tournament dates on the calendar, the extended clay season is certainly something to be proud of. The Year
