If you are using a version of Microsoft .By Matt Kasper After spending half a decade at the University of Maryland, Baltimore County, I can proudly say that I have established a decent relationship with my in-state school's library. The library at UMBC is a treasure trove. Unlike most public libraries, UMBC's library is not underfunded or understaffed, and it doesn't seem to have a rule that says it has to lend out its free events to only one university, which makes it wonderful. I've spent countless hours in the library, sometimes actually trying to study or read, but other times more browsing through the archives or reading books in the children's section, which I think is illegal but not worth arguing about. If you're in Maryland, I would highly recommend visiting UMBC's library. After months of planning, researching, and writing, I'm so excited to start a new feature for Cracked - a few days ago, I had the opportunity to spend an afternoon at UMBC's library, and I got to experience some of its services firsthand. I was there to network and get a tour of the library, and I definitely got more than I bargained for. Like many public libraries, UMBC's is operated by the Baltimore County Public Library system. They're led by the Director of Strategic Planning, Barbara Steffens-Riordan, and I met her at her office, where she was gracious enough to give me a tour.
